Law Student Rachel Gold (3L) Receives Fulbright Full Grant to Argentina

Seattle – Rachel Gold, a third year University of Washington law student, received a Fulbright full grant March 13, 2006 to study the right to clean water as a human rights issue in Argentina.

As a Fulbright Fellow, Gold will study the development and governance of the right to clean water. Her work is hosted by the Center for Human Rights and the Environment (CEDHA), an environmental non-governmental organization (NGO) in Cordoba, Argentina. Her work centers on the Argentinian constitutional guarantee that citizens have the right to a healthy environment. However, this access is often regulated at the regional and local level, which has lead to citizen complaints over water quality and cost, especially in rural areas. Gold plans to focus on these conflicts between citizens, the public sector and private companies, and develop a “rights-based” approach to solving this complex and compelling environmental issue as it relates to human rights.

Gold, who is fluent in Spanish and has lived in Latin America, is a 1999 graduate of the University of California, San Diego, with a degree in Sociology and minor in Pan American Studies. She has also served as an interpreter and translator for a UN conference and has conducted field research in rural Chile on forestry issues. As a UW law student, Gold has worked with the Berman Environmental Law Clinic to address environmental degradation issues related to water quality and endangered species.

Gold is the second Fullbright Fellow from the UWLS Class of 2006. Anthony Milewski is currently in Russia studying “Public Perceptions of the Russian Jury System” and will return to the UW in the fall.

Law School Professor Prosterman Receives $250,000 Leadership Prize

Claremont McKenna College and the Kravis Leadership Institute announced March 14, 2006 the selection of UW School of Law Professor Roy Prosterman, founder and chairman emeritus of the Rural Development Institute, as recipient of the inaugural Henry R. Kravis Prize in Leadership for his pioneering work in fighting for the rights of the rural poor to own land, one of the underlying causes of global poverty. The Kravis Prize, which carries a $250,000 award, honors extraordinary leadership in the non-profit sector. Prosterman has designated the Rural Development Institute (RDI) to receive the award money. The Kravis Prize will be presented May 6 at ceremonies in Los Angeles.

Prosterman founded RDI 25 years ago to institutionalize the work he began in the mid-1960s, fighting one of the chief structural causes of global poverty: rural landlessness. With passion and professionalism, the young attorney attracted a small team who shared his vision and his commitment. As a result of Prosterman's leadership, RDI has become an extraordinarily effective advocate for international land law and policy reform. Based in Seattle, with field offices in China, India, and Indonesia, RDI attorneys and staff have worked with the governments of 40 developing nations, foreign aid agencies, and other partners to design and implement fundamental legal, policy and programmatic reforms to help the world's rural poor.

A graduate of Harvard Law School, where he served on the Harvard Law Review board of editors, and the University of Chicago, Prosterman joined the law school in 1965 and was named the first John and Marguerite Walker Corbally Professor in Public Service in 1991. He has been director of the law school's post-doctoral program in Law of Sustainable International Development.

Book of the Week: Washington Appellate Practice Deskbook
by Nancy McMurrer

Some attorneys limit their practice to appellate litigation; other litigators handle appeals infrequently. The editors-in-chief describe this two-volume book as a “cookbook,” designed for both experienced and beginner (or occasional) appellate advocates. Its goal is to guide litigators in the mechanics of an appeal so that the lawyers and the judges can focus on the issues. The scope is limited to cases brought to the Washington Courts of Appeals and the Washington Supreme Court; the book does not discuss appeals from courts of limited jurisdiction or from administrative agencies to Superior Courts.

The first chapter presents a handy guide to using the book; it suggests starting with the two overview chapters that describe the general appeal process and the applicable rules of procedure. The first and the most significant question (i.e., should the case be appealed) is discussed in chapter 3. Remaining chapters cover the intricacies of appellate practice, including discussions of relevant statutes, rules of procedures, and court decisions.

The contributing authors, who include UW Law Professor Helen Anderson, have extensive backgrounds in appellate practice. In addition to explaining the process, these experts offer advice in the form of practice tips, comments, and caveats, which are set out in boxes scattered throughout the book. Some chapters include forms or careful descriptions of the required content of court documents.

Washington is fortunate to have this and several other resources for lawyers handling appellate cases:

- “Rules for Appellate Court Administration” and “Rules on Appeal,” in 2A & 3 Washington Practice (Rules Practice) (KFW80 .W3 at Reference Area)

Do other states have similar guides? Many do. You can find a bibliography of state appellate practice handbooks at the website of the American Bar Association’s Committee on Appellate Practice, http://www.abanet.org/litigation/committee/appeal/statpractice.pdf.

'DONATE A DAY'S PAY' FOR CHRJ
- Do you have a firm job for the summer?
- Do you care about Human Rights?
- Do you like to hobnob with your professors?

The Pitch...
Help the Center for Human Rights and Justice (CHRJ) fund a full, $5,000 summer grant for a UW law student to do human rights work this summer by 'donating a day's pay' to CHRJ's grant fund. If you donate $100 or more, we will reward you with a student/faculty party at the home of Prof. Kristen Stilt. CHRJ committee members will serve you home-cooked food, beer and wine, and you will get to chat with professors in the fields of Corporate and Human Rights law in an informal setting.

The Purpose...
In the past, using proceeds from the CHRJ Bookstore, CHRJ has funded a half grant-- $2,500--for a student to do human rights work over the summer. Last year, one student used the half-grant to work at the Northwest Justice Project, researching the collateral consequences of criminal history and the application of criminal history in connection with fair housing violations. Summer jobs like this one are usually unpaid, making it difficult for law students to finance their summers, so we want to do more.

The Party...
Where: Prof. Kristen Stilt's home
When: April 8, 2006 at 7:00 p.m.
Who: Corporate and Human Rights law professors, including Joel Ngugi, Kristen Stilt, Sean O'Connor, Paul Miller, Anita Ramasastry and more...
What: Lots of wine, beer and home-cooked food
How: Donate $100 or more to CHRJ's summer grant fund and you're in! Stop by the CHRJ bookstore or e-mail chrj@u.washington.edu today to donate or make a pledge.

Please know that all donations to CHRJ, including monetary donations to the summer grant fund and donations and purchases at the CHRJ bookstore, are extremely welcome and appreciated. The thank-you party for those students who can afford to 'Donate a Day's Pay' allows us to especially thank them for their generosity.

CHRJ BOOK DONATION WEEK - WEEK 1 SPRING QUARTER
Tired of Torts, Contracts, and Civ. Pro? Never plan on looking at Tax Law again?

Ready to get rid of your old textbooks?

CHRJ will be happy to unload them off your backs for you! AND you will receive free baked goodies in return!

CHRJ will be accepting donated and consigned books during our Book Donation week. Please bring your used textbooks to school during the first week of spring quarter. If you've ever bought a book from the bookstore and saved $$, please consider donating or consigning.

Look for us in the hallway during the lunch hour.
Monday, March 27 - Thursday, March 30
